At Winters End (The New Springtime Book 1)

Under the domestic maritime codes of almost all the civil law countries under examination France, Italy and China the act of God and the sea peril Hague-Visby Rules exceptions-and sometimes others as well-are combined into one exoneration clause In these countries, the combined liability exceptions have traditionally constituted unforeseeable and irresistible events, characteristics that approximate them to the civil law force majeure concept The latter is described as a natural or man-made occurrence which is unforeseeable and irresistible, rendering performance of a contractual or an extracontractual obligation impossible The standard of care that a carrier needs to prove to justify the presence of a force majeure event varies from country to country: France and China require a reasonably unforeseeable and irresistible occurrence 50 whereas Greece mostly refers to unavoidable events by utmost diligence and care higher standard of care than reasonableness Italian law is not clear on whether reasonableness or a higher standard should apply to the unavoidability of the event The civil law defence is strictly interpreted in practice: Only extreme weather conditions such as a hurricane, a cyclone or their effects may exonerate the carrier Apart from the traditional case law trend approximating sea perils to force majeure events, there are cases that dissociate the exception from the domestic force majeure concept. These also set the tone for politically favored sports and recreational activities, such as excursions.
